about the conference

A tiny percentage of major injuries at work (fewer than 1 in every 15) now result in a Health and Safety Executive (HSE) investigation. The numbers of inspectors has dwindled in recent years, while the numbers of prosecutions taken and enforcement notices issued have continued to fall dramatically. Continuous unsustainably low levels of government funding for the HSE mean worse is likely to come.

In March 2009 the Information Commissioner disclosed that 3,213 construction workers were listed on an illegal blacklisting database which in an industry synonymous with hazards at work speaks volumes about the spiralling human costs to construction workers. This is especially so in the context of the DWP commissioned report by Rita Donaghy which called for legal duties on all company directors for health and safety and a stronger involvement of trade union safety representatives.

However, despite the report the government is consulting the construction industry again about their safety record and while the statistics for 2008/09 showed a minor fall, there were still 147 fatal workplace injuries. Deregulation of entire chunks of the economy continues to come at the expense of workers' health and safety while unrepresented and undocumented workers need a clearer framework of regulation within which to work. Further, an increasingly internationally fragmented labour market underpins the necessity to keep workers' health and safety firmly on the agenda throughout the economic recession.
